THE NATIONAL PARK AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE TOURISM IN THE REGION

Summary

In article presents statistical and legal description of issues concerning areas National Parks in Poland, who comprises protected areas with particularly outstanding scientific, natural, social, culture and educations characteristics.

The use of natural resources in environmentally valuable areas (in National Parks) raises many negative opinions regarding the function of tourism and its methods of management. Tourism is considered to be the type of human activity which strongly penetrates the environment and has a large impact on the nature at the local, regional and global level. Regions which are protected for their properties need to be managed according to the rules of sustainable development. The main aim of the regional and local policies of such areas should be preservation of the existing values and environmental resources along with their appropriate management. Anthropopressure in National Parks is a phenomenon that should be controlled and economic activities of man should be subject to the principles of sustainable development.

Translated by Robert Górniak