CONTROVERSIES OVER TOURISTIC DEVELOPMENT ON ENVIRONMENTALLY VALUABLE AREAS

Summary

The article refers to the current discussion on the tourism development on the areas rich in nature value. Their greatest value consists of richness of fauna and flora, landscapes variety and anthropocentric values affecting a human organism and forming human behavior. These are areas of wide biodiversity, a small degree of dimensional change and a low pollution level, which does not disturb the functioning of primary ecosystems.

According to the author, determined priority has natural environment over any human activity. Therefore, touristic activity should subject limitations in accordance with sustainable development rules. Under such a condition areas environmentally valuable can become attractive places of touristic receptions. Moreover, they offer a real capability of recreation as well as refreshment and at the same time function as reserves of natural resources and simultaneously highly valued elements of landscape. They give a chance of stable economic growth of local community.

Translated by Marcin Łuszczyk