Summary

Passenger preference surveys are conducted in a number of Polish cities as part of the research into the urban mobility demand.

The results have allowed us to identify the requirements passengers have of the public transport system. A comparison has also been made of the priority lists in various cities and the degree to which the requirements are fulfilled.

There are also shown the punctuality as a most important requirement and comfort as uncountable requirement preference.